POSITIVE ATTITUDE FOR POSITIVE OUTCOMES

There are many factors that result in a successful career: education, experience, interpersonal skills, self-motivation, and the list goes on. So, what if I told you that the right attitude is equally as important as your knowledge, many companies openly admit to recruiting based on personality over skill.

So what is the right attitude, how can you develop the right attitude and what are you missing out on if you don't have the right attitude?

Attitudes are directly linked to behaviour. That is why the right attitude is viewed as a strong predictor in your success and also why it is such an important factor for employers when recruiting. Your attitude is strongly related to your mindset, interpersonal communications, your perception of others and yourself. A positive attitude doesn't come naturally to everyone, but there are ways to develop or maintain this way of thinking. A few key tips are:

Foster a positive internal dialogue: Take a closer look at what you are saying to yourself and train that little voice that talks to you to be open and welcoming of new ideas and directions.

Words are powerful: Take note of the words you speak. If you find yourself talking about situations or others in a judgemental way or communicating with someone in a disrespectful way, something needs to change. What you say creates a direct path to your success

Tap into your enthusiasm: Understand what motivates you and remind yourself of your goal/s. Linking what you are doing now to your goals will give you a clear view of why you are working two jobs, studying constantly and haven't been on a holiday in a few years (for example). Recognise and see that you are making progress and working towards your goals. Then unleash your enthusiasm. Enthusiasm adds more strength to everything we do; more energy when we are speaking with someone, more meaning when we explain something.

As the saying goes, practice makes perfect! We all face challenges and it can be difficult at times to maintain this outlook but remember, a positive attitude encourages positive outcomes.

Employers recruit based on attitude because it influences how an employee responds to changes, roadblocks or challenges in the workplace and how they interact with others. The right attitudes are contagious and can lead through example, building strong cultures which increase productivity. These attitudes view challenges as opportunities to learn and grow and will take action to find solutions. The benefits of fostering the right attitude will not only build a successful career path but I'm sure you can see how it will positively affect other aspects of your life.
